

Convenience Fees and How They Work

Last Modified on 09/06/2022 2:00 pm PDT

We provide the information below as a general overview, but it is not intended as legal advice. You are encouraged to consult with your own legal counsel prior to implementing any convenience fee program.

What Are Convenience Fees?

Convenience fees are charged for the privilege of paying for a product or service using a non-standard method of paying. For example, movie theaters usually sell tickets in person at a ticketing window. If the movie theater also gives customers the option of paying for tickets online, the theater could charge a convenience fee for the online ticket orders. Customers are not paying for the right to use their credit card but for the privilege of paying in a non-standard method.

Are Convenience Fees The Same As A Surcharge?

The answer depends on whether you are comparing surcharges and convenience fees under state laws or under the card brand rules. Under state laws that prohibit surcharging, there is no material difference between a surcharge and a convenience fee. If a state law prohibits the addition of a fee associated with the use of a payment card, then it generally does not matter what that fee is called, even though state laws tend to refer to those fees as "surcharges."

When it comes to the card brand rules, there is a difference between a surcharge and a convenience fee, and the two are often confused. A convenience fee is sometimes mistakenly referred to as a surcharge; however, there is a difference between the two under the card brand rules. A surcharge is charged for the privilege of using a credit card as a form of payment. A convenience fee is assessed for using a more convenient payment channel and is not limited to credit cards. It is very important to understand which can and cannot be utilized by a merchant and in what circumstances.

What Card Brand Rules Apply To Convenience Fees?

Presently, the most detailed guidelines for the application of convenience fees appear in the Visa rules 5.5.2.1 and Table 5-6, which are hyperlinked here for your convenience. Reference to convenience fees also appears in the MasterCard rules at Rule 5.12.2. Note that card brands generally update their rules twice a year, so the linked versions may not be the most recent ones; however, the rules are publicly available online.

Guidelines For Applying Convenience Fees

As an overview, Merchants may charge a convenience fee to credit or debit card transactions under the following conditions:

- The Merchant must notify the Customer of the convenience fee prior to finalizing the payment and give the customer the option to cancel the transaction.
- All transaction receipts must display the amount of the convenience fee. If using the Virtual Terminal, the generated receipt will comply with this guideline.
- The payment must take place in a non-standard payment channel, i.e. you can only charge a convenience fee for a non-face-to-face transaction.
- A convenience fee must be a flat, fixed amount.

- The convenience fee must be applied to all means of payment accepted through the non-standard payment channel.
- The convenience fee must be included in the transaction amount total.
- A convenience fee cannot be applied to recurring payments.
- The business collecting the payment may not be exclusively operating in a card-not-present environment.
